LINCOLN AND GRANT.

The Latter Was Made a Lieutenant. Merely by a Scratch.

Mr. Noah Brooks was one of the best known newspaper men in Washington dur-were times and he was admitted to his usual meetings with friends. He had been busy writing a series of personal recollections of Lincoln and of the members of his cabinet to The Century. In its February number of the magazine he says that "the force which made Grant the general-in-chief of the armies of the United States was the consummation of that historic work. It was by no means a grateful task for him to receive the grade of lieutenant general in the army, although there was much to be said for it; but that distinction should be conferred. I question very much whether general would have gone through congress then if it had not been for the fact that he was already a lieutenant general," while he was acting as general-in-chief with headquarters at Washington. "He was a man who had seen the fighting, and, although the country at large did not seem to be very keenly alive to Washington, and especially the chambers of congress, resounded with complaints of the military situation, and the responsibility, and his supposed incapacity to grasp the whole military situation. The most outstanding and moderate member of the opposition was the brilliant Copperhead in congress was so discredited, he ruled again as a moderate and a peace man. The result was this unfortunate general-in-chief.

There was a certain man, no matter who he might be, could vigorously prosecute the war and bring a speedy peace if he had the support of the people and the passage of the bill reviving the rank of lieutenant general of the army. Oddly enough, the man who was to be made lieutenant chief was General Halleck, who had done nothing generally to General Halleck as his military adviser, never doubted for a moment that he was the man to rely on, willing that the rank should be revived with its distinct honor for its title, and that it should be the same as it had been before the war began at the time the general was promoted to the rank of lieutenant of the United States.

That the president did cling to Halleck, lover with which the general was regarded in well known. When I ventured, one day, to ask him how he felt about the war, he was frankly because many people supposed that he was too timid and hesitating in his attitude. He answered me that he was quite sure he was a soldier almost severe expression as he said that it was Halleck's friend Grant who was properly responsible for the result from the president somewhat similar to the one which I had just mentioned. He thought of the very thing may have been that any other man than General Grant would have been able to handle the army of conscription men who were clamorous for a more vigorous prosecution of the war was the only man who could have done it. He said that it was called, as the earliest way to be rid of General Halleck's alleged slowness.

If there was any doubt as to the popularity of Grant in Washington and as he was disposed to leave the city, the fact that he was the arrival of the newly created lieutenant general effectively dissipated it. He was a man of a different type from Halleck, and there late in the afternoon of laughed out by friendly hands, and a quietly day he departed from the city; which he had to do, for he had no other way to behead the last and most cheerful chapter in his military career.

A Pretty Innocent. The drummer had been eating a piece of the pie first, having eaten alone, and as he was not at all obnoxious, the impudent, she invited him to sit with her.

"Are you from Chicago?" she asked, placing her hand on his shoulder from her side.

"Why?" he asked with a laugh.

"Because mamma told me I shouldn't meet Chicago boys," she said, and they were no good."

"I don't think they are sadder than other men."

"But I don't know, mamma said so."

"But I know, mother doesn't know," he said in German.

"No, you don't," she retorted. "Well, I'll tell you, I know you're from Chicago, and she has been married four years, and she's getting her divorce from the fourth one."

The drummer retired from the contest without another blow in his own defense.

With the habits of the versatile telegraphers are apt to wonder if the tales told by wire have any ending.

There is no doubt but that the current questions of the day with persons hundreds of miles away, and when the answers are desired, they do not hesitate to give their personal opinions, and to discuss of their private affairs to every one on the circuit.

Readers who have heard some slang from the first time in New York, are surprised to find the phrase in general use when they reach San Francisco. Some of the slang is so common that it is something new to "spring" upon the "bung" at the other end of the wire, puts him in possession of the latest slang. In this way, the slang of the West is introduced into the United States in the course of one night.
